In recent years, the Islamic culture of the Arab countries has faced a strong collision with the civilization of other European countries, which has directly led to the evolution of the Arab countries from traditional to modern countries. Especially after the "World War II", the Arab countries were involved in the wave of globalization, and with the theories of Arab nationalism and Islamic socialism as their guiding ideology, they began to explore the independent development paths of their respective countries, and gradually realized this historic social change.

As Alexander N. Chumakov asks in his book: what is happening in the modern world and how is it fundamentally different from the past ages and centuries? How is it fundamentally different from past ages and centuries? There are also many who defend traditionalism in behavior and thought, and there are also many who defend traditionalism in behavior and thought, but do not accept the common view. Let us pose the hypothesis, where will the modernization of the Arab countries lead? At the fork in the road of the times, where the world has evolved from the bipolar pattern of the post-World War II era to a multi-polar pattern, and has gradually moved towards globalization in response to the current of the times, the Arab countries and their peoples have continued to engage in new explorations and attempts in one wave of globalization after another, which has been either a war or a peaceful evolution. It is the enlightenment brought about by religion and the self-evolution of Arab civilization and Islamic culture.
